The Situation in Killarney.

[Killarney (Feb. 21) Correspondence of Dublin Freeman.]

In my last despatch I mentioned a report that had reached me relative to a meeting having been held by the Fenians near Cabireiveen on Tuesday week. I have since heard that the gathering took place under the pretence of attending a "wake." Head Constable Connell, at Cabireiveen, so soon as he heard of the gathering, sent to the Gladiator gunbont, lying off the neighboring coast, for assistance, and an armed boat was despatched to the town to afford protection.

It is understood that further important imformation has been received from the writer of the amonymous letter, which led to the arrest of Capitalin Moriarty, an arrest that it can now with certainty be stated mainly prevented the outbreak from assuming serious proportions. It was Mr. Cruice, R. M., that Mr. Galway consulted with on receiving the letter, and at that interview they at once determined to test the accuracy of the communication by sonding police to meet the car that day from Cabirciveen and arrest any person on it answering the description given by the writer. When Capitain Moriarty was brought to the police barrack he seemed quite cool, and expressed surprise that he should be arrested. Mr. Cruice asked him if he had any papers that would show who he was, and he at once said he had, and pulled out the letter addressed to Sheehan, in Killarney. [Castletown-Berelaven (Feb. 20) correspondence of Cork Examiner.]

Her Majesty's ships Racoon and Pigeon arrived here yesterday from Plymouth, and several other ships are bourly expected. Rumor has it that the ships were sent in all haste for Castletowa, as it was currently reported "over the water" that the town was in a blaze as well as Kularney. It appears telegraphic despatches were forwarded to England on the arrival of the ships here to contradict the statements alluded to above. The constabulary from some of the outlying stations have been ordered into the town, taking with them their arms, ammunition, beds, &c. The stations so deprived of men are Iries and Adrigole, the former statum in charge of constable Cochrane. The Allihies, or Berehaven mines, another detached station, has been reinforced. There was a rumor here on yesterday evening that about four hundred of the insurgents were among the hills at Giengariffe, eighteen miles from this, but the truth of this I cannot vouch for. The people here are not in the least excited, feeling confident that if any attempt was made the number of police in the town would be quite sufficient to insure tranquillity.

The Fenians in England—A Counter Movement at Warwick, and the Guns of the Castle Out.

[From the Dublin Freeman's Journal, Feb. 23.]

Tuesday evening much alarm was occasioned at Warwick, England, by Mr. Hickling, the Chief Superintendent of Police, receiving a telegram from London to the following effect:—"A number of suspicious locking persons left Paddington station by the quarter-past six train for Warwick. They will arrive there at quarter past nine. Head Centre stephons is said to be among them." On receipt of the telegram Mr. Hickling communicated with the Mayor, and also with Captain R. D. Vaughton, who is in command of the mittia staff at the barracks, and Captain Vaughton at once ordered the officers and sergeants of the staff under arms, and they were supplied with ball cartridge. A number of the local volunteers were also called out. A large quantity of arms being stored at the barracks the gates were closed, and the staff remained under arms until nearly midnight. On the arrival of the 9.15 P. M. train from London about thirty persons alighted, and called for cabs to take them to Warwick Castle. During the evening it transpired that the persons who had arrived by the train had come to Warwick

About noon on Wednesday an active looking young man nade his appearance at the Central office, in Chat street, and inquired for the officers in charge. His dress and bearing indicated a new arrival, and much interest was manifested to know what news he brought regarding the riving in Kerry. He declined giving his name, fearing that it might implicate his family in the town of Cahirciveen, and that it might also militate against the design he entertains of returning very soon to Ireland. He is the object of very anxious inquiry by the hadding of the headquarters, and rumor already has it that he is the man who shot down the mounted policeman Duggan. He states that Colonel O'Connor, himself and nearly ninety men met by preconcarted arrangement at as old school house, within four miles of Cahirciveon, on the night of February 12. One-half of the party were armed with rifles that had been purchased and secreted a long time previous, the remainder had no arms. The band started at midnight for the village of Kells, about seven miles distant, and situated in a gorge of the Iveragin mountains. The police barracks in the village was the first place at which they hatted at an early hour in the moroing. Admittance was demanded, which was readily granted, and something like a welcome extended to the intruders. The policeman, five in number, gave up their arms. The barracks was then searched, and a still further supply was obtained without opposition. The coast guard armory was next relieved without the slightest troble, until finally the insurgents found they had more arms and ammunition than they could conveniently carry. At daylight a consultation was held, whon it was resolved to despatch Capitain Moriarty by the mail coach to Killarglin and Killarney, to notify the Fenians in these places that the rising had begun and to spread the intelligence. The arrest of Moriarty while on his journey explains the failure of a simultaneous rising. In the meantime Colonel O'Connor was moving on Killarney, Duggan came up with the insurgents on a lonely part of the road, and after passing the band put spurs to his borse and attempted l street, and inquired for the officers in charge. His dress and bearing indicated a new arrival, and much interest

The Arion Vocal Society is as productive of comicals was not given to the press, and an investigation failed to point out the person who had made complaint against the prisoners, or the cause which had led to the seizure of a large quantity of circulars and tickets.

It is to be supposed, however, that as the "Grand

to beneft is directors than anyone else,
it had been looked upon somewhat unfa orably land
that some one or other had preferred a charge sgainst
the firm and caused the arrests. A private circular to disposal for seventy five cents when taken in quantities of eight or more, and contained the request that the

that the grand distribution of prizes, which was "to be conducted on the mutual benefit principie," would take place at the Cooper Institute on Monday, the twenty-fifth day of April, 1867. The ALUMNI ASSOCIATION OF DARTMOUTH COLLEGE.

This association, composed of the Alumni of Dart-mouth College, residents of this city, assembled last evening at the Bancroft House, on the occasion of their third annual election of officers, the President, Rev. LL.D., and numerous other men of note, science and learning. As interesting statement of the condition and resources of the college was made by Professor Smith, from which it appears that numerous additions and improvements are shortly to be made to that time-honored institution, now rapidly approaching its centenary. Among the contemplated additions are a library, an Alumni hall, in which are to be placed cenotaph memorials to the momory of the dead, particularly those graduates who fell during the war, a laboratory and a gymnasium. About $100,000 have been subscribed, nearly all of which is paid in, for this improvement fund, and about $200,000 more are needed. This amount the friends of the enterprise feel confident of realizing. Short addresses were made by Professors Crosby, Alphonse Wood and others. The election for officers remilled in the following selections:—D. E. Wheeler, President; Professor R. R. Pearsiee, Vice President; Walter Gibson, Li. B., Secretary; William M. Chamberlain, M. D., Treasurer. After a few remarks of acceptance and congratuation, the party, some fifty in number, partook of an elegant colintion. THE EXTENDED POWERS OF THE CENTRAL PARE BOARS.

The Senate committee has unanimously reported the bill giving to the Central Park Board the power of opening and improving streets, taking it away entirely from the Common Council. The bill will also be introduced this evening, very probably, in the Assembly, which held a very short morning session, owing to an adjournment to attend the funeral of the late Clark B.

Cochrane.

THE PIRE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The bill to permit fire insurance companies whose capital has been impaired to resume operations on their reduced capital was up in Committee of the Whole in the Assembly last evening. The bill progressed to a third reading, and will, it is expected, pass. It is to be regretted that it will pass, because, as the failure of these companies was the result of their own mismanagement, the bill enables them to evade the punishment of their own folly. Mr. Creamer, of New York, ably opposed the bill, but imprudently, I think, stirred up a party feeling on the subject, which is likely to pass the bill by a strictly political vote. He charged the New York insurance companies with having effected the passage of the Metropolitan Fire Commission bill in 1865, and deemed it right that they should now suffer the consequences.
